Let's Review

Education, or the lack of it, gets blamed for about all the world's ills. It is pretty generally agreed that the peoples of Earth need teaching, or perhaps re-teaching. Moreover it is not much trouble in any company to start a free-for-all discussion about the science of education. In fact there are some who insist that teaching is an art and not a science at all.

Some commentators crusade for penetrating study in narrow fields of learning while others whoop-it-up for wider browsing ranges. Both philosophies can be run to extremes. Over done, specialization gets people in ruts while versatility, gone wild, leads men's minds a wool-gathering. Surely there is a happy medium, seeing that both extremes are selfish and quite short-sighted.

What to Study

Schooling actually does not help people much unless it makes better neighbors of them. It should, by all means, train them to engage in activities with other people, for the benefit of all. Today this is clearly the most essential feature of education because people who don't understand co-operation are being led by the nose straight through collectivism to dictatorship.

George William Curtis once wrote: "While good men sit at home, not knowing that there's anything to be done, nor caring to know, half persuaded that this republic is the contemptible rule of a mob and secretly longing for some splendid and vigorous despotism, . . . remember that it is not a government mastered by ignorance; it is a government betrayed by intelligence."

Betrayed by What?

We have a sad state of affairs indeed when intelligent people realize that things are taking place which they suspect are very bad for the country, yet fail to take a hand in remedying matters. Preserving the personal liberty of all people ought to be every man's personal duty. Those who have been without freedom consider its safety a high moral obligation.

Some men have deep learning in fields that do not embrace history, government or economics. Others have gained far-flung knowledge without sensing the duties of citizenship or any obligation toward other people. Curtis' long life ended before this century began but he saw the political dangers of this day with amazing clearness: "Betrayed by intelligence," he said.

Time Fades Facts

The notion that a nation may be governed, not by a ruler but by the people themselves, was not new in Mr. Curtis' time. Our own republic was hardly half as old as now when he began writing for "Harper's Monthly." Otherwise he had all the examples we have. One big difference in his generation and ours is this: "They still appreciated their freedom."

Students would not be helped much now by a smattering of more arts. Neither is there a crying need for more specialization. Consolidating our recent scientific gains and preserving our freedom is our No. 1 problem. Our vital classroom need is a refresher course in comparative welfare. Where and under what system have the most people lived the best lives? Answer: We have it, right here in the U. S. A.
