the child's food and milk from contamination. It is particularly important, however, to be on the alert in the summer when food is more apt to spoil than in cool weather.

Since milk is often the cause of summer complaint, the mother should be very careful to give the child only milk which is free from all harmful bacteria. The safest thing, after the child is weaned, is to use pasteurized milk. If this cannot be obtained, then the mother should boil the milk thoroughly herself and permit it to cool in containers which have been thoroughly cleansed and sterilized.

HEALTH FOR ALL

Mothers are inclined to dread baby's second summer because of the disease commonly called "summer complaint".

Summer complaint, or infant diarrhea, is most apt to attack children between one and two years of age and it is peculiar to hot weather. It is very serious and usually costs the lives of many young children.

The disease makes the baby's bowels move frequently and it may cause vomiting. It is often accompanied by pain and fever. One of several things may cause infant diarrhea. Probably the most frequent cause is impure milk or water, or spoiled food.

The child has greater difficulty in digesting food in hot weather and if he eats anything which is even slightly tainted it may create a poison which his system attempts to throw off and diarrhea results. Nature should be assisted, not hampered, in the effort to get rid of the poison. This means that the child should not be given any food at all during the attack. Only water, which has been previously boiled should be given him. Food including milk, may cause a further upset and must be withheld.

Of course, great care should be exercised at all times to protect
