LUXURY TENDS TOWARD UNGRATEFULNESS

If we had all of the things for which we should be thankful we would not be thankful for any of them. Because: Prosperity and luxury create in man a spirit of ungratefulness.

Even in spiritual matters, practically everything is relative, so if a man has everything he desires he has no contrast with which to compare his condition and his wealth callouses him against the hardships of others from whom he might gain knowledge springing from experience.

On this basis, we have nationally and internationally much to be grateful for this Thanksgiving.

We have made considerable recovery from the war during the last year, although our success has been tempered with set-backs and failures. Strikes and a general slowness in securing materials have reduced our production of merchandise for which our people have been clamoring. Many kinds of property, including building materials are still hard to secure. People throughout the nation are living in cramped and unsanitary places because our material recovery has not kept pace with our demand for housing. However, so long as we have a roof over our heads and food in our pantry we can feel satisfaction in our thankfulness.

Life is a series of struggles, or for some it seems like one continual struggle, both for individuals and for nations, so that when we tumble into another problem we can be thankful that we have overcome the other one.

Although some means of settling labor differences other than the strike must be evolved, we can be thankful that the laboring man has gained the right of collective bargaining and that the government has the right to prosecute violators of our labor laws.

On the international scene, we can be thankful that representatives of the world's nations are gathered in one body attempting to reach peaceful solutions to the problems that confront the universe. They are working for their national interests, but the program is a wholesome indication of what can be accomplished through peaceful means.

ARMY SURPLUS MATERIALS

to help meet a rising demand for TELEPHONE SERVICE

Communications equipment manufactured for the Armed Forces was the best that telephone science could produce. Of course, most of this equipment is unsuited to peacetime use, but wherever possible we have secured surplus materials that could be fitted into the telephone system, providing some of the much needed telephone facilities in many communities of the Mountain States Area.

12,000,000 feet of field wire
1,000,000 feet of drop wire
3,125 miles of copper and steel strand
320,000 other items, such as bolts, insulators and braces

These materials supplement our regular supply and, while only a small part of the total quantity needed, they are helping us to get ahead with our job of extending telephone service to more and more families.
