

National Master To Speak Friday

public is disgusted with all farm legislation and is in a mood to junk the whole business", State Grange Master Morton Tompkins told the delegates Monday that farmers and their organizations should be advocating the steps necessary to correct the weaknesses in farm legislation.

Tompkins, who will end a 10-year period as head of the state's largest farm organization, reiterated his belief that the Brannan plan should be given a trial run.

"If we can clear away from it (the Brannan plan) the smokescreen of partisan politics, there are several features of the plan which have a lot of merit," Tompkins asserted.
Tompkins praised the 1800-unit limitation feature of the bill as a "forward step toward maintaining the family size farm," a basic feature of the long range program of both the National and the Oregon State Granges.

"That part of the Brannan plan which has received the most fire," said Tompkins, "has been the production payment method of support. The National Grange program . . . favors the use of production payments as a last resort. I am in full agreement with that, and I would use them only when accompanied by marketing quotas which had previously been voted by two-thirds of the producers of a particular commodity."

Tompkins also praised that part of the National Grange farm program which recommends the establishment of a bi-partisan 12-man commission which would consult with the secretary of agriculture in working out agricultural policies and programs.

"Farm legislation," said Tompkins, "makes excellent political fodder and I think that by the creation of this bi-partisan board, we might be able to take some of the politics out of this particular field."

The Grange master was not so enthusiastic over a system of flexible support prices advocated by the National Grange. He asserted that this type of support program militates against the small producer. Commenting on the so-called Grange purge of legislators who voted to amend the initiative and referendum provisions in the Oregon constitution last year, Tompkins, quoting from his annual address at last year's session, reiterated that "we cannot stand idly by and let men continue in public office who have so little regard for democracy that they take from the people these basic rights."

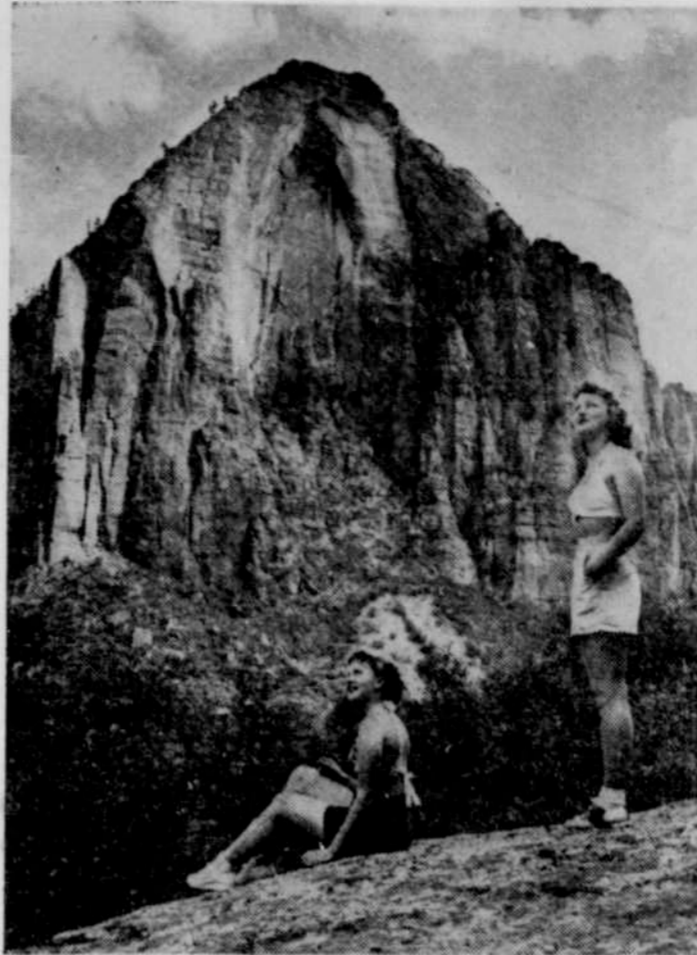

"The Grange in Oregon worked long and hard for the initiative and referendum," Tompkins said. "We have been attacked for our efforts to retain these rights. History would condemn us more, and rightly so, if we surrendered them without raising our voices in most vigorous protest."

Gilbert Shibley of the Springwater Grange in Clackamas county was selected as winner of the juvenile declamatory contest for the 11-to-14 year group.

The fifth degree was conferred by the Malheur Pomona degree team and the sixth degree was exemplified by state officers Wednesday night.

The delegates were scheduled to vote this morning on the question of whether the Grange should enter the automobile insurance business

Red Arch Mountain

Background for the young summer visitors to Zion National Park in southern Utah is Red Arch Mountain. This huge mountain of red stone is used as an example of the way nature carves out colorful monuments that line the canyon walls. Geologists believe that some day this may be a tremendous natural bridge of bright vermilion stone carved out by the effects of erosion, wind and weather.

Fifty-two full-size exact duplicates of the Liberty Bell will tour the nation during the drive due to the generosity and cooperation of America's copper producers. One of these bells will be on tour in this state.
