The Administration's Duty

(Seattle Post-Intelligencer)

President Truman is asking Congress to provide $10,486,976,000 in "new" military funds, and to meet part of the requisition by levying 5 billion dollars in new or increased taxes.

The President wants the 10 billion dollars because, as the "little war" in Korea suddenly demonstrated, our national defense is inadequate, although we have expended in four years of peace 50 billion dollars for military purposes.

Our unreadiness to meet promptly a so-called "police action" in an area as limited as South Korea indicates that the administration has made no wise use of the immense funds it has already had.

So the administration wants more money to do what it should have done before.

And, of course, Congress will assign the funds, if no better way can be found.

But there is a better way—or at least one that should have priority.

For how has it happened that the administration now calls for "war taxes" to meet its military needs?

Actually, we have continued on a war-tax basis all during the peace—or "cold war"—period.

The excise war taxes have never been repealed or reduced.

The personal income and corporation taxes have remained at high levels.

Payroll taxes still flow into the treasury.

Consequently, new war taxes must be added to the war taxes already in effect, which have been retained ever since the last war ceased.

This happens partly because of the New Deal's gross mismanagement of defense expenditures.

It happens more largely because of the New Deal's extravagant expenditures for non-military purposes.

Obviously—and in view of the administration's current deficit—the primary defense need is to eliminate all "unnecessary expenditures" and put to defense uses the sums retrieved.

If this be done, no tax increase would be justifiable at this time, since the administration would have in hand the 5 billion dollars which it seeks in new taxes.

If the job were well done, the administration might have even the whole 10 billion dollars desired for military requirements—and perhaps enough besides to balance the budget.

Until the administration is willing to make some political sacrifices for the national security, its demands for sacrifices by the public are made with very ill grace.
