Farm Magazine
Started By OSC

The first issue of a new quarterly magazine designed to keep Oregon farmers posted on the latest farm research findings is being distributed by the Oregon State College agricultural experiment station.

The new magazine, "Oregon's Agricultural Progress," tells the story of research developments in popular, concise fashion.

Included in the first 20-page issue are major articles on successful cattle feeding, breeder seed, broodiness, use of male hormone injections in boosting beef gains, range improvement and farm business outlook. There are also special sections for crops and soils, orchards and garden, livestock and homemaking.

A special feature of the first issue is a state fall spray schedule. Chemicals to use on the various weeds and rates of application are listed for the different areas of the state.

Copies of the first issue are being distributed by Oregon county agents. After the first issue, distribution will be by mailing list from OSC. There is no charge to Oregon residents.

A card for requesting future copies will be included with the first issue being sent by county agents to all persons on their mailing lists. Additional subscription request cards are available from county agents or interested persons may simply write to the bulletin clerk, OSC.

Robert Mason, experiment station editor, is in charge of the new publication. An advisory editorial committee of five research workers assists in the selection of story material.
