Food Sense—Not Nonsense

Need A Lantern?

No matter how you see it—vitamin A has eye appeal. It plays a role in keeping eyes and skin healthy. Lack of this vitamin produces night blindness.

The victim of night blindness is the motorist who in the twilight strains to see approaching traffic, or the theatre-goer who upon coming into the dimly lit movie from the bright foyer gropes blindly for a seat. This difficulty in seeing in dim light or adapting to darkness is the most clear-cut effect of the lack of vitamin A. Night blindness is a dietary disease. It can be cured by eating foods rich in this vitamin.

The role of this vitamin is also skin deep. Too little vitamin A may cause dryness, itching and scaliness of the skin over the entire body. Shortly after this vitamin was discovered, it was thought to have some effect on control of colds and respiratory infections. Research, however, has failed to show that fewer colds occur among persons receiving supplements of vitamin A than among those persons who eat a well-balanced diet.

For an A plus diet, eat plenty of liver, milk, eggs and green and yellow vegetables. Table fats contribute vitamin A, too. The generously buttered slice of enriched bread offers a tasty way in which to get important parts of an adequate diet—needed vitamin A from the fat, B vitamins, minerals and protein from the bread, and energy from both.

Vitamin A, as such, does not occur in plants, but is present in the form of a brilliant yellow substance—carotene. Yes, this carotene paints the carrot orange, and carotene received its name from this vegetable. The body produces vitamin A from carotene. Vitamin A is a fat soluble vitamin and needs the help of a digestible fat for its absorption. Fish liver oils have long been known as rich sources of vitamin A. However, it is manufactured extensively in the laboratory today.

Butter Spreads Add Flavor

Butter spreads are fun to have on hand to make breads, vegetables and casseroles taste just a little different and just a little better. Butter's creamy texture makes the mixing easy, and butter's fresh flavor remains to give that rich taste we like so much. Always buy butter-protected in a paraffined carton to keep it safe from exposure to light, off-odors and physical damage.

Here are five delicious spreads:

Butter and Honey: Blend softened butter with honey, half and half, and serve it over hot cooked carrots and sweet potatoes, or serve on pancakes, waffles or hot muffins.

Butter, Mayonnaise and Lime Juice: Blend 1 tablespoon softened butter with 1 tablespoon mayonnaise, 1 teaspoon lime juice and a dash of salt. Good with hot cooked peas, celery, artichokes, asparagus, green beans, broccoli and spinach.

Butter, Creamed Cheese and Minced Onion: Blend 1 tablespoon softened butter with 2 tablespoons cream cheese and 1/2 teaspoon finely minced onion. Dot over scalloped potatoes or a vegetable casserole before baking, or serve as a spread for crisp potato chips for an hors d'oeuvre.

Butter, Deviled Ham and Mustard: Blend 1 tablespoon softened butter with 1 teaspoon prepared mustard and 2 tablespoons deviled ham. Serve on canned corn, broiled tomatoes or crisp melba toast.

Butter and Grated American Cheese: Blend softened butter and grated American cheese half and half and add a little mayonnaise to make an ideal spread for broiled sandwiches, a casserole topping or to spread over broiled hamburgers.

and Lois Garner.
