July is independence month — and this year it's brand re-recording time in Oregon for thousands of livestock owners. To retain their present brands, owners must renew their applications every five years. How to get this job done fast and without headaches at both ends of the line has been a perennial problem at the State Department of Agriculture. This time the department has hit upon a streamlined idea that it thinks will do the job. You see it above. It's a ready-made application blank. All the stockman needs to do is to sign his name, draw in the earmarks used and return the form along with the recording fee. The form above will go to all stockmen of record already filled out as you see it. This particular application covers cattle; similar ones cover horses, sheep, swine and poultry. It's taken a crew at department headquarters in Salem months to get the brand applications ready for mailing. The first 2000 applications will go in the mail July 1, and 2000 more daily until mid-July. After that—well, the department's animal division hopes this will bring in the brands!
