Now It's the Public's Turn

Now that the smoke is clearing away from the numerous fires that flared up when Malheur county's polio epidemic was at its height and a mass gamma globulin clinic was set up in Nyssa, it is time for residents of the country to give serious thought to a health unit.

First of all, there's been enough, if not too much finger-pointing. It's time to stop burning members of the county court in effigy and start from scratch with some common sense instead of citing errors and blunders of the past. State health department spokesmen have admitted some errors in their administrative duties insofar as helping secure recognized and qualified employees to fill vacancies in this county. Many doctors here have indicated there has been some laxness in telling the public "what it's all about" insofar as public health is concerned.

A sanitarian is to be hired by the county, but nothing has been done about a public health nurse who can carry on the prescribed duties in the schools.

Those who are interested in better health should go beyond their own sphere of associates to ask questions and give information. Malheur county can have one of the best health units in the state at a reasonable cost if logical plans are started now and built by sensible discussions and fewer gripe sessions.
