Seven Years Work Well Done

Never a believer in "The Indispensable Man" theory in either public or private affairs, The Journal this week along with many others, is wondering if John O'Toole might not have been near that classification insofar as his association with Malheur Memorial hospital is concerned.

This fast-moving, quick-thinking and highly efficient hospital manager will be missed. He can be given much of the credit for building Malheur Memorial while serving as superintendent, manager and general boss since shortly before facilities were put into use in 1950.

Mr. O'Toole has a knack of making decisions in a split second and seldom being in error. During his tenure here he never hesitated to express his opinions to members of the board of directors and to the medical staff. For this he gained their utmost respect and caused no antagonism that could detract from the hospital.

With the public he could be hard-boiled when circumstances led him to believe his hospital was being imposed upon, but at the same time he never left any room to doubt his just consideration for the individual and for the general public.

It will be hard to think of Malheur Memorial hospital without thinking of John O'Toole and his wife, Mary, who deserves a great deal of credit for her husband's seven years of work exceptionally well done.
