"Adrian Rocket Men" Set Pattern For Many Fields of Leadership

One of the greatest thrills we have experienced in many months occurred Sunday when we were privileged to witness preparations for, and the firing of, a rocket by Adrian high school's Science club.

Steve Sayre, Donald-Ashcraft, Larry Norris and Les Brice conceived the idea of the rocket some five months ago and have had one successful launching and a few misfires, all of which have added tremendously to their knowledge, experience and self-training. Their enthusiasm is spreading to many of their fellow students.

The scientific aspects and the home-made rocket itself, while a pleasure to inspect, are secondary insofar as our exultation is concerned. These boys were able to instill a feeling of utmost confidence in them by the manner in which they are handling their strictly electric project.

They represent leadership and ability to make elaborate plans many adults might copy for any field of endeavor.

There was a decided absence of "youthful foolhardiness" or thrill-seeking desire, but an air of comradeship accompanied by their American-like banter that never once overbalanced their common sense when the exact moment came to become serious in their preparations. There was every indication of well-planned safety measures for themselves and for other youngsters and adults present to witness the launching.

These young men actually radiated their scientific reasoning, months of study and devotion to a project that has suffered some minor setbacks that only spur them on to greater efforts for another successful launching of a better and more accurate rocket.

Adrian and Nyssa both have hundreds of youngsters who are daily displaying similar leadership and commonsense reasoning, but adults are too often prone to overlook or take for granted the merits of youth. The "Adrian Rocket Men" are cited because they have started something different in this area and the human angle cannot and should never be overlooked.

While the project did not actually come from the class rooms, the idea was germinated in Adrian high school, which, along with parents of the boys and the entire community, can be justly proud that initiative, leadership and self-discipline have not faded from the American scene insofar as adolescents are concerned.
