College Life Now, 'Then' Compared: Old Rules Listed

The three R's of education may never change but take a look this Centennial year at some of these "old time" reports of college life.

Taken from the files of Oregon State college, Oregon's oldest state-supported institution, the reports point up some of the changes that have come on college campuses in the state's first century.

In the 1880's, for example, "ladies and gentlemen" of the student body did not "converse" on college premises. If they did talk to one another, they were subject to from five to 25 demerits. Only 100 demerits were cause for dismissal from school.

General disorder could cost you five to 100 demerits; leaving recitation periods without excuse, five to 30; and failure at recitation, five to 10.

Living costs in the 1890's ranged from about $5 to $9 a month. Total estimated expenses per year for students at the turn of the century were between $140 and $150.

In October, 1891, the study hours of Oregon State college were from "8 a.m. to noon; 1 to 4 p.m.; and 6 o'clock in the evening to 7 o'clock the following morning, during which hours students are not allowed to be on the streets of Corvallis, or to be loitering or playing on the college grounds, or elsewhere, without special permission."

Basketball was played by women students several years before it was taken up as a sport for men. Foot races and field hockey were popular sports for college women and until 1922, inter-school athletic competition was held for women.

During the administration of B. L. Arnold, second president of OSC, 1872-1892, 1 hour's labor on the college farm was required of each student on school days. There was no pay. Later, however, students were paid five cents an hour for work.

Seniors were required to deliver an oration before the student body until the custom was discontinued in 1907 at the "unanimous request on the part of the senior class." Hazing of new students was outlawed in 1906. The school of home economics was first named household economy and sanitation.

The shape of the ball was different then, but football competition for OSC dates back to 1893. The first building on the present campus, Benton hall, was a gift of the citizens of Benton county in 1889. OSC is located now on the site picked in 1851 for a "territorial university" that was never built.

The first degrees were granted in 1870 to two men and one woman who had completed graduation requirements in either the "classical course" or the "scientific course." OSC graduates to date now total 33,070, with a new record enrollment of approximately 8300 students expected this fall.
