Gallup Poll Shows People Want to Know follows, to-wit:

Ever since Frederic Wakeman zeroed in with "The Hucksters," the advertising world has been subjected to a rolling barrage of criticism which raked over everything from the sincerity of the ads themselves to the personal habits of the men who write them. But what does the public really thing of advertising?

One answer came this week from none other than pollster George Gallup, who has just finished his first sounding of U.S. opinions about advertising (at the behest of Redbook Magazine). The public. Gallup found, is solidly in the adman's camp. Seventy-five per cent like advertising and 65 per cent say life would be "more difficult" if ads should suddenly disappear. And if faced with the choice between advertised or unadvertised products which cost the same, 76 per cent voted for advertised products.

Gallup also discovered that, contrary to a pet theory of the anti-huckster forces, Americans in the top economic, social, and educational brackets hold the highest opinions of advertising. His findings: Seventy-five per cent of professional and business people, 77 per cent of upper and middle classes, and 78 per cent of the high-school graduates voted for at the hour of 8:00 o'clock P.M. advertising.
