Farm Chemicals Usage Session Scheduled Feb. 11

Four hundred persons are expected to attend a one-day conference on use of agricultural chemicals at Oregon State College Thursday, Feb. 11, under joint sponsorship of the college and the state department of agriculture. The session will open at 9:30 a.m. in the Home Economics building.

The conference is an outgrowth of recent developments in the spray residue field and will attempt to bring present knowledge on the subject into focus for Oregon people.

Originally designed for ground and air applicators of farm sprays and dusts, the Feb. 11 session has been expanded to include representatives of county courts, garden clubs, processors, chemical companies, county agents, and farm, labor and consumer organizations.

Anyone interested in using, selling or handling chemical pesticides is particularly urged to attend. F. E. Price, dean of agriculture at the college, and Frank McKennon, director of agriculture, will chairmen the morning and afternoon session, respectively.

Virgil Freed of the state college staff will keynote the session with an opening address on "The Importance of Chemicals to Agriculture".

Other speakers will discuss pesticides from the standpoints of industry, governmental regulations and public health.

State and federal laws relating to all agricultural chemicals, clearance under the federal regulations and labeling requirements will highlight the afternoon program.
