Easy-Care Dress Shirts Are Popular; Use Survey Told

Improvements in men's shirts are making it easier to launder dress shirts at home, but surveys show homemakers are not taking advantage of these features.

Hildegard Streufert, Oregon State college extension clothing specialist, says that three-fourths of the 84 million dress shirts manufactured last year fell in the "easy-care" class, yet only about half of these shirts were laundered at home. The rest were sent to commercial laundries.

"Easy care" refers to cottons treated with a special resin finish or a blend of two fabrics — cotton and a synthetic.

A good quality "easy care" shirt may cost from $2 to $3 more than the same quality cotton broadcloth shirt. However, tests indicate that quality of these finishes is reduced after a few commercial launderings.

In home laundering, a home-maker ironing time is reduced from 15 to 2 minutes with "easy care" shirts. If a homemaker values her time at $1 an hour, she could realize substantial savings in dollars, hours and energy in laundering these shirts at home, the home economist points out.

She is also able to enjoy these features for the life of the shirt if she follows manufacturer's directions on laundering temperatures, use of detergents and bleaches, and care she gives shirt during laundering.

In recent years, improvements have been made in the construction of "easy care" shirts, which reduce ironing time and improve their finished appearance. Seams are now made with single rows of stitching instead of double rows; top facing in the center front of the shirt has been eliminated to reduce the undesirable puckering which appeared in the first dress shirts made from "easy care" fabrics.

"Easy care" shirts have also increased in popularity because of their ability to resist soil and wrinkling, says Miss Streufert. She also notes that since informal casual living has become a nationwide trend, stiffly starched collars

SWEET SUCCESS!

—but, then, Falcon had it from the start!

Never before has a "first year" car enjoyed the acceptance that Westerners have given the Ford Falcon. America's lowest-priced six-passenger car! It's the nation's best-selling compact car! Falcon's quality is built in. Its performance is a matter of record. Before the first Falcon was delivered, Ford put regular production-run cars through a severe 176,000-mile test. Now, less than a year later, millions of miles have been rung up by Falcon owners...proving what we knew from the start: that you get up to 30 miles per gallon with the most delightful driving car owners have ever experienced.

When you're the sales leader—as Falcon is—that means better trading opportunities, especially with the entire production of a major West Coast plant being devoted to Falcon. The waiting's over! See...just drive...and take delivery now on your Falcon!
