Record Corn Crop Due in Oregon; Other Crops Down

A larger corn crop, but smaller harvests of other grains are forecast for Oregon this year, reports Mrs. Elvera Horrell, extension agricultural economist at Oregon State college.

The largest corn crop ever produced in the state is due for harvest this fall, Mrs. Horrell found as she studied reports from the U. S. department of agriculture. A crop of more than 4 million bushels is forecast, which would be 8 percent above last year's record high and nearly 2 1/2 times the average of the past 10 years.

However, wheat, Oregon's largest cash crop, may show a drop of about 3 percent compared to last year, Mrs. Horrell also found. This year's crop is forecast at about 27 million bushels. This would still be about 2 percent above average.

The state's oats crop, expected to total about 7.1 million bushels after harvest is over, will be 8 percent below last year and 29 percent less than average. Barley production is predicted to total 16 million bushels, 18 percent less than last year but 5 percent above average.

Estimates of possible horticultural crop output in the state are also varied, Mrs. Horrell said. Oregon's late summer potato crop is expected to turn out a shade below last year, but 32 percent above average.

A snap bean production second only to 1958's record is in the making. The 87,600 tons expected this year would be up 5 percent over last year and 29 percent above average. Oregon leads all

Other states in snap bean production.

Unfavorable weather during and following pollination left its mark on the state's tree fruit and nut crops. Only the apple crop looks heavier this year, Mrs. Horrell said, with cherries, peaches, pears, prunes, filberts and walnuts all expected to drop below last year.

Nationally, crop production is expected to match the all-time high of the past two years. Acreages are down a trifle, but yields are up.
