Big Increase Shown In Young Hunters' Gun Safety Projects

Oregon teenage hunters have only three months before the new law becomes effective requiring them to have a certificate of competency in safe handling of firearms, reminds Andy Landforce, OSU extension wildlife management specialist.

The increasingly popular 4-H gun safety project is one way for young hunters to get their certificates, he points out. The other way is through classes taught by the Oregon State Game commission.

More than 400 Oregon teenagers (61 of them girls) were enrolled in the 4-H gun safety project last year. Although Landforce expects this number to double during the coming year, he points out that the potential number runs into the thousands. Each year, about 30,000 Oregonians under age 17 buy hunting licenses.

After Jan. 1, 1962, these young hunters will have to earn their certificates of competency in safe handling of firearms before they can get their hunting licenses. The certificate will be issued to those who pass the Oregon Hunter Safety Training program.

The 4-H gun safety project is divided into five phases: 4-H safe shooter, 4-H marksman, 4-H sharpshooter, 4-H expert rifleman and 4-H hunter. The first phase, the 4-H safe shooter, includes the Oregon Hunter Safety Training program. Those who complete this project automatically receive their certificates of competency, which enable them to purchase hunting licenses, it was noted.

Landforce explained that the Oregon Hunter Safety Training program teaches gun safety techniques, and the rest of the 4-H gun safety program gives supervised opportunity for the young people to practice what they've learned under a certified instructor.
