Survey Reveals Acreage Changes In Grain Crops

Larger acreages of corn, hay and spring wheat are being planned by Oregon farmers this year, along with smaller plantings in other grain crops, report Oregon State university agricultural economists.

The 1962 planting intentions were gathered by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, with more than 100,000 farmers in the nation reporting. The survey only shows intentions which may be subject to change, the economists stress.

In Oregon, growers plan to cut acreage planted to barley by 21 percent; oats, 11 percent; dry field peas, 6 percent. Last fall, 10 percent less winter wheat and 7 percent less rye was seeded than a year earlier, the report shows.

In contrast, farmers are planning to increase their acreage in spring wheat by 7 percent, corn by 9 percent and hay to be harvested by 5 percent. The spring wheat acreage planned is the largest since 1957. No changes are contemplated in acreage for sugar beets or late summer or fall potatoes.

If Oregon farmers stay with these intentions this spring, it would mean that the barley acreage would be the smallest since 1953 and oat acreage would be the lowest on record back to 1927. Winter wheat would be the smallest since 1943, while acreage seeded to rye is the lowest since 1934.

Nationally, the report shows that farmers expect to plant slightly less this year, with acreage of crops planted or to be planted expected to total 306 million acres. If realized, the economists say, this would be the smallest planted acreage total of record and 4 1/2 million acres less than last year.

Intended acreage of oilseeds is up one percent, as is hay acreage. Tobacco, sugar beet and dry bean acreage may increase, with a possible drop in acreage planted to dry peas. Growers also plan fewer white potatoes but more sweet potatoes.
