'Stress Good and Admit Bad Effects' Is Advice to Pesticide Applicators

Public relationwise, Rachel Carson's book on pesticides has dealt agriculture and pesticide applicators a blow which will linger on for the next few years.

The impact can only be overcome by factual, not narrow or biased, information to the public—information that admits dangers and possibilities of damage but accents the choice between possible effects from untrained use and what life would be without benefit of pesticides.

These are some of the comments of J. F. Short, director, state department of agriculture, made to Oregon pesticide applicators in the closing talk before their three-day short course sponsored by the department and Oregon State university Dec. 17-19.

Examples of good effects of pesticide usage can be as sensational as the opposite picture, he emphasized.

Urges Safe Handling

Manufacturers, he said, should continue to develop maximum safety with effectiveness, should not soft-pedal the unavoidable and inherent dangers and everyone concerned should, above all, constantly emphasize the need for safe and proper handling. The least slip now, he declared, will be sensationalized even though caused by carelessness of one individual.

Short suggested schools for careful training and education of the farmer, so he may protect his workmen, animals and crops—training as careful as commercial applicators undergo.

Short predicted the current public uneasiness will result in tendency of lawmakers, on both state and federal levels, to impose tighter and tighter restrictions on the industry unless those who are closest to use of the products "keep the public away from the panic button."

He further predicted the 1963
