Oregon State Bar Discusses History Of Bankruptcy Laws

Possibly on the first of the month when the bills come in, you make some reference to going bankrupt. As a general rule, however, most of us never give this phase of the law much thought, according to the Oregon State Bar association. But did you know that the right to pass laws relating to bankruptcy is specifically given to Congress in our Constitution?

At the time the Constitution was drafted, the laws of England and other countries permitted imprisonment for debt. Thus, a person in debt could be thrown into prison and held there until someone paid his bills, the state lawyers group reports.

Under our federal bankruptcy laws, a person who cannot pay his debts because of poor business conditions, too much credit buying or unexpected loss of income can go into bankruptcy. This can be done either as a voluntary act of the debtor or at the request of creditors.

When a person goes into bankruptcy, he must place all of his property, both real and personal, in the hands of the court. Exceptions are made as to certain items of personal property and clothing. The bankrupt must file under oath detailed schedules of all his debts and all his assets.

Should a person after knowing himself to be insolvent give away or sell property in an attempt to defraud his creditors, the court will take the property back. If his statement to the court is false, he can be punished for perjury.

After receiving all of the debtor's assets, the court will convert his property into cash and distribute it to his creditors. After this is done, the bankrupt will be discharged and his creditors can no longer pursue him on these obligations. The bankrupt is no longer in disgrace but free to keep on working without fear of court action or prison.

Most of us will keep right on paying our bills, but it surely is good to know that if it ever becomes necessary that we can get a second chance.

Leaf-Cutter Bees Prove Valuable, Reports Bulletin by OSU Entomologist

Like a perplexed homeowner in a modern suburban subdivision where the houses all look alike, a leaf-cutter bee in an alfalfa field sometimes gets confused in finding his home unless it's painted a distinctive color.

This is but one of several observations Oregon State university entomologist Dr. William P. Stephen reports in a new bulletin, "Propagation of the Leaf-Cutter Bee for Alfalfa Seed Production."

Since the leaf-cutter bee was first reported in Oregon in 1958, it has proved a valuable alfalfa pollinator. But it needs help to do its job most efficiently, Stephen points out.

For instance, a grower can control time of bee emergence to correlate with peak alfalfa bloom. The entomologist explained that bees can be induced to emerge earlier if overwintering pre-pupae are located in a heated area and exposed to limited direct sunlight. Similarly, emergence of overwintering bees can be delayed by placing nesting sites in protected or refrigerated places.

Location Determines Generations

Location of nesting sites also can determine whether one or two generations of bees appear each year.

Leaf-cutter bees will nest in a variety of situations: milk straws, corrugated cardboard, holes bored in wood, hollow rubber and metal tubing, stems of pithy plants, etc. The bulletin offers suggestions for building different types of man-made domiciles and field stations to provide shade and protection for the nesting bees.

It also suggests ways to control beetles, ants and earwigs, all common enemies of the leaf-cutter bee.

Free copies of the bulletin are available to residents of Oregon from county extension offices or from OSU Bulletin Clerk, Corvallis.
