Milk Production Decreases in Oregon Despite Having Best Pastures in U.S.

Oregon's July 1 pasture condition was rated best in the nation, thanks to the cool damp June weather which benefited the state's milk cows, reports Mrs. Elvera Horrell, Oregon State university extension agricultural economist.

Oregon pasture conditions, rated at 93 percent of normal on July 1, shared honors with Nevada as the best in the nation, she noted from U.S. Department of Agriculture reports and other information. For Oregon, this was three percentage points better than July 1, 1962, and about the same as average for that date from 1957 to 1961.

Pasture conditions elsewhere in the west were spotty, with good growth evident from Montana and Wyoming to the Pacific coast. However, eastern Colorado suffered drought and pasture conditions in that area were rated at 49 percent of normal, while Arizona and New Mexico recorded very little measurable rainfall. California pastures were unusually good during June except for the extreme south.

Milk Production Below 1962

Milk production in Oregon continued its downward trend the first six months of 1963, Mrs. Horrell said, with production about six percent below the similar period last year. Prices were off two percent.

Oregon's 1962 milk production totaled approximately 1.1 billion pounds, down three percent from 1961 and the smallest since 1925. Fewer cows were milked last year and production per cow was off a shade, the first time in 10 years that output per cow reversed its upward trend, she said. Production per cow in Oregon, however, is the second highest on record.

Last year, Oregon milk producers sold 84 percent of their output to plants and dealers as whole milk. Such sales took only 68 percent of the total 10 years ago, Mrs. Horrell pointed out.
