to keep your home comfortably warm

These heat exchangers, at left, cool natural gas after it has been compressed, as it is being sent from the fields to the local gas company that serves your home. This is part of the complex process by which natural gas is transmitted long distances to heat your home, cook your meals, supply you with hot water and furnish many services to business and industry. Employees and equipment of El Paso Natural Gas Company serve the 11 Western states, delivering 10 times the energy supplied by all federally financed electric power generators in the same area. The cooling process is one of many interesting steps along the way—from discovery of gas, through well development, processing, compressing, transmission and final delivery to your own neighborhood.* It all adds up to a major industry, operating for the present and future benefits of the people it serves.
