Specialists Says Money Sense Needed by Today's Youth

It doesn't take a youngster long to learn that money buys many of the things he wants. But the ability to manage money wisely—using it to get those things that are really important—doesn't come ready-made. It has to be learned, says Mrs. Alberta Johnston, Oregon State university home management specialist.

It takes time and experience to develop "money sense," and youth ought to get some experience in order to become competent adults in managing their money.

Youngsters Pick Up Traits

First step in teaching youngsters about money is for parents to clarify their own attitudes about money and how it's used. If parents overspend, disagree about where money should be spent and argue about saving vs. spending, youngsters will pick up some of these same traits.

One suggestion is for parents to discuss in presence of youngsters what money is available, expenses and what each puts value on. Youngsters are much more understanding about why their wishes can't be answered if they know why, advises OSU's specialist.

Teenagers need to be given responsibility for some money whether it's an allowance or money that they earn. They need to know what's expected of them in using the money—and if they make mistakes, they'll need to live with them.

Should Share in Work

Mrs. Johnston doesn't believe that an allowance should be paid for assuming routine chores around the house. She says that everyone in the family should share in family work, pay or no pay. Chores are just a part of being a family.

An allowance should take into consideration costs in the community in which you live (bus fare, lunch, clothes, etc), what expenses it's supposed to cover and who's responsible for emergencies that arise. The more experience a teenager can have in handling money the better he should fare as an adult, says Mrs. Johnston. This is of some significance as one out of three marriages in Oregon are performed with a teenager as the bride.
