Specialist at Oregon State University Tells Proper Lighting for Home Study

Parents who provide well-lighted study areas for youngsters may find that school work comes easier and faster—for both of them.

Bernice Strawn, Oregon State university home management specialist, gives these suggestions for what a study area should include.

1. A flat-top desk or table 24 by 46 inches gives adequate working space. Place somewhere away from family activity and not in front of a window.

2. Provide a good study lamp. This might be a table lamp with an 8-inch diffusing bowl, with the bottom of the socket no more than one inch below the shade. A shade that flares at the bottom gives wider light distribution. Avoid gooseneck, bullet or pole-type lamps for study purposes. They cause harsh reflected glare into a child's eyes when light is concentrated on white paper.

3. Table lamps should have a minimum 50-100-150 watt three-way bulb or a 150-watt frosted bulb.

4. Pick a light-colored shade, especially on the inside. The bottom of the shade should be 15 inches from the desk top in order to give a good spread of light.

5. A pair of lamps either wall or table-type provide more even desk light than a single unit. If they're wall lamps, hang them 30 inches apart at a height above the desk which locates the bottom of the shades at about eye level of the user. If one lamp is used, put it to the left of a right-handed student, so a shadow isn't cast as the student writes.

It's estimated that one out of five grade school children has eye defects and two out of five at college graduation have some kind of eye deficiencies.

MEN AT WORK

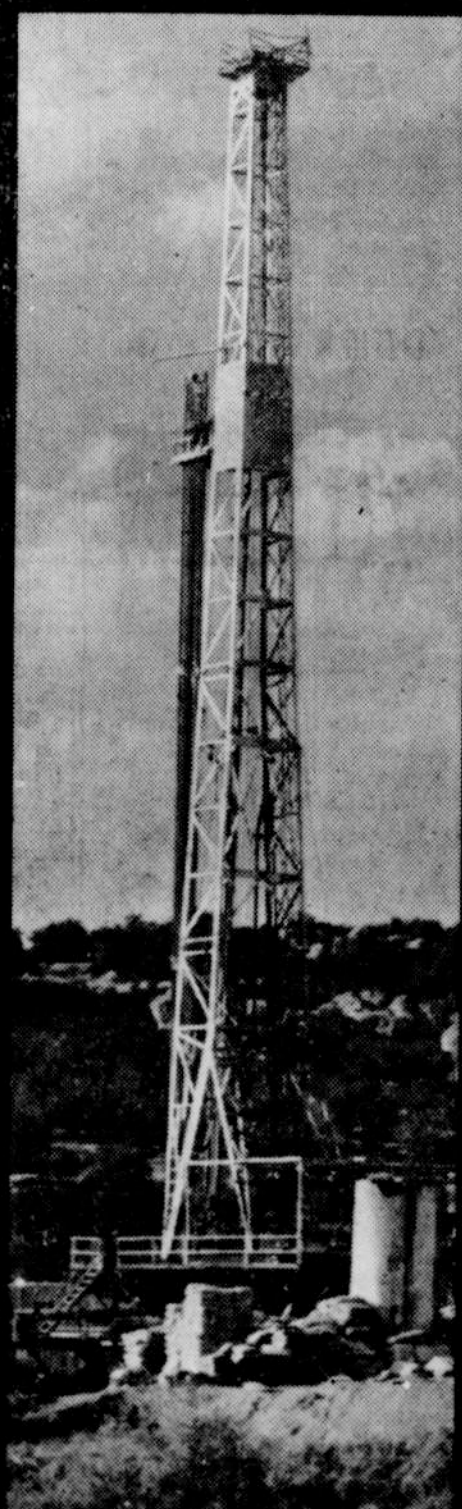

helping to solve your laundry-day problems

These men aren't working on a new type of laundry machine, but they are helping remove laundry-day problems from thousands of Pacific Northwest homes. These are "roughnecks," drilling for natural gas—the wonderful fuel that heats your wash-day water and dries your laundry more quickly, more gently than any other way. Drilling for natural gas is a tough job—and a costly one. Despite modern technology, "roughnecks" need strong muscles to operate drilling equipment. Then, only one exploratory well in nine actually turns out to be a producer; and each well costs $100,000 and more. But the effort and the cost are tremendously worthwhile. Because, of course, natural gas does many things well—in addition to smoothing out your laundry days. Natural gas serves 40 million homes in the United States. Thousands of industries and businesses rely on natural gas for a multitude of uses. If you are not yet using natural gas, learn its advantages . . . call your retail gas distribution company* soon.
