Auditors Checking Employment Files For Truthfulness

The Oregon Department of Employment recently sent out a bulletin urging all applicants for unemployment insurance benefits to tell the truth in their applications.

The applicant must be actively seeking work, able to work and available for work in order to receive benefits and he must accurately report any money earned during the period he is filing for benefits.

If the department finds he has falsified any material facts on his application, the claimant faces the possibility of losing future benefits and must repay any benefits already paid to him. Furthermore, if his case is tried in court and he is found guilty of falsifying his claim, he faces possible fines up to $500 and jail sentences up to 90 days or both.

If the applicant has a number of employers during his base year, which is the first four of the last five calendar quarters, it pays him to keep his own records of amounts earned from each employer and the dates he was paid.

Auditors are constantly checking claims files and questioning all apparent misrepresentations as they run across them. During fiscal year 1963, more than 2600 cases required investigation. Of these, 936 were disqualified for misrepresentations and 31 were prosecuted in court, receiving sentences ranging to 90 days in jail and fines to $300.
