Cascade Natural Gas Utility Creates Public Relations, Advertising Body

Vane H. Rusco, local manager in Nyssa for Cascade Natural Gas corporation, has received advice from the firm's president, O. Marshall Jones, that the company has established its own public relations and advertising department.

"Our growth has reached the point," Jones has advised all Cascade managers, "where we have much to tell our customers and the public generally in the cities we serve."

"From a modest beginning only 11 years ago, Cascade today serves 59 communities in Washington and Oregon. We are a fast-growing family and it is evident that we should now engage our own staff for the handling of matters pertaining to public relations and advertising."

Lyman E. Robbins, until recently promotion manager of the Bremerton Sun, will head the new department in the Cascade building in Seattle.

Cascade Natural Gas earlier this year received much favorable comment on financial pages throughout the Pacific Northwest for its successful operations in 1963. Earnings in excess of $1 million amounted to $1.17 a share and enabled the company to pay its first dividends.

Company Continues Expansion

Growth of the company continues. Current expansion involves Grays Harbor county in Washington where Montesano will receive natural gas service on or before Aug. 1. Twin cities Aberdeen and Hoquiam, where extensive pipeline grid systems are now being laid, will have gas about Aug. 15.

"We are especially pleased with the outlook for expanded industrial use of natural gas in Washington and Oregon," declared C. Spencer Clark, chairman of the board for Cascade, in a recent address to western utility executives.

"Our company will announce during 1964 the addition of several new major manufacturing accounts and some of the names will be quite revealing in connection with the important role natural gas is destined to play in the industrial development of the Pacific Northwest."
