Pesticide Users Given Safety Tips By State Chemist

Home gardeners have had the weather on their side this spring, but it has also been a season that pleases many insect pests that feed off gardens and crops, damaging them and often destroying them if not controlled.

Controlling them these days usually means a program of dusting and spraying. This brings a reminder from J. D. Patterson, chief chemist for the Oregon Department of Agriculture, who reminds users that they need to exercise extreme care and follow instructions on containers.

Noting that pesticides can be safe when used according to directions, the chemist points out that these directions are compiled only after manufacturers of the chemicals have spent many hours on research in determining the amounts to be used and precautions that need to be taken.

Check List Suggested

He has suggested a check list to follow when working with and handling pesticides.

At the top of the list is—"Always read the label completely and carefully before using and then use as directed."

The 10 other do's and don'ts on his suggested list for safe handling and storing of pesticides are: Never store in anything but the original container.

Keep out of reach of children, pets and irresponsible persons. Wear a mask and water containers around areas to be sprayed. Dispose of empty containers safely, so they are out of reach of children, pets and farm animals.

Use as directed so resulting crop meets residue tolerances, if there is a residue.
