A Facial For Mt. Rushmore

A crew of daring specialists from the National Park Service will climb 6,050-foot Mt. Rushmore in South Dakota's Black Hills this spring to give the granite countenances of Presidents Washington, Jefferson, "Teddy" Roosevelt and Lincoln their annual "facials." Strangely, the basic ingredients in these treatments is linseed oil, the same material used by Egyptians 5,000 years ago to preserve their mummies and today the ingredient in house paint that protects against sun and weather, according to research experts of the National Fixseed Processors Association. Preservation of the giant carved faces—each 60 feet long—is a large undertaking. The repair experts patch cracks resulting from weathering with Sulptor Gutzon Borglum's original compound, a mixture of linseed oil, white lead and granite dust, so future generations can admire this memorial to our great presidents.
