IT'S YOUR LAW

By Oregon State Bar

Fire, Fire!

The clang and sound of the fire engine rushing to a fire fascinates most people. People flock to the fire where they can get burned, crushed in a crowd or the rush of firemen or policemen.

The other day a big fire broke out in Mrs. Jones' neighborhood. Feeding the fire was a big wooden house under construction, with heavy oils and tars near it. A crowd gathered. Mrs. Jones got pushed closer and closer to the fire.

All at once a new gas line blew up. It knocked Mrs. Jones down. Running from the fire, the crowd trampled and crippled her.

Mrs. Jones sued the builder. She said that he was at fault for welding so near the oily timbers and the gas line. He should have known of the danger.

The court agreed with Mrs. Jones: She assumed no risk by watching the fire. For she could not have known of the gas line or any of its dangers. Nor did she contribute to her accident. The flying debris and the stampeding crowd caused her injury, not her own negligence.

The jury decided that these events were foreseeable and were caused by the builder's negligent use of his welding equipment. Nevertheless, it's a good idea to stand clear of crowds which may panic.

Even though someone is at fault, unforeseeable events can relieve him of the blame, or some of it. Just because you negligently start a fire, it does not mean you are liable to the owners of every building in the fire's path. A sudden wind that whips up the fire may intervene to relieve you of liability.

But persons who interfere with fire trucks or run over fire hoses and stop firemen at work can be liable to building owners for their interference.

Still you should foresee some unlawful or mob action. A person who allows gasoline to flow in a gutter should expect that someone might toss a match or cigar into it and light the gas.
