PRODUCTION LINE... OREGON STYLE

Meat production in Oregon is a $100 million industry, and growing in volume every year. Although our lush grasslands are still the basis for prime beef, more and more producers today operate their own feedlots, where animals can be fed and finished without the need for shipment to midwest fattening centers. A steer can gain a pound of marketable weight from every 6½ to 7½ pounds of Oregon feed, and increase in value from $75 to $100.

Stock producers find this method more profitable than the purchase of additional range land. In this type of business analysis, more and more beef producers turn to their helpful First National bankers for counsel. The First National Branch Manager shown here with a Central Oregon stockman represents a ready source of market information, management help, and financial support for this growing industry. He is typical of First National people throughout the state, serving other Oregon people with the finest in banking service.
