Feedlot Disease Causing Losses

Some western cattle feeders are now suffering losses from a disease that appears to be confining itself to feeder lots.

Oregon has not missed the disease, according to veterinarians with the Oregon Department of Agriculture, but to date only a few cases have been reported and diagnosed in the state.

More commonly called "Sleeper Disease in Cattle," the technical name for the disease, which in some states has caused death losses as high as 10 percent in cattle pens it hits, is infectious thromboembolic meningoencephalitis.

Dr. George Coburn, an assistant veterinarian with the department of agriculture, says mortality will run up as high as 95 percent in animals showing well established symptoms of the disease. The victims usually weigh from 750 to 1100 pounds, are from one to three years of age and have been on feed from 40 to 110 days before the symptoms are noticed.

Early Detection Difficult

He said early signs of the disease are difficult to detect and the finding of dead animals and animals approaching death is usually the first indication of the disease among the cattle.

Animals affected with it are reluctant to move, stiff and slight-

State Legion Meet Slated at Newport

American Legion representatives will hold their annual Department of Oregon convention on July 7-9 this year at Newport, according to Charles Steffens, commander of Legion Post 79.

"This will be Newport's largest convention in its history," Commander Steffens said. "The 'Vacation-Convention Center' made a bid for the project and Legionnaires are assured that the entire motel complex of the city and surrounding communities will be available."

Included on the program will be a tribute to World War I veterans — especially to founders of the American Legion, some of whom are expected to be in attendance.

ly lame. There is also often a knuckling over at the ankle joint and temperatures may run as high as 107 degrees. Shortly before death there is staggering gait, a weakness in the hindquarters of the animal and paralysis.

Because the disease strikes the brain and nerves, it is difficult to successfully treat cattle with well established symptoms. However, animals in the very early stages of the disease have been saved and Coburn's advice to cattle owners is to call a veterinarian immediately when animals show symptoms of being ill.
