Parking Violations Can Be Expensive

Parking or stopping in a "no parking" zone can be a lot more expensive than just the cost of a parking ticket.

The problem of parking on the street has become nearly impossible in the downtown areas in many towns and cities, making it very tempting to use "no parking" zones when you are in a hurry.

What if Sam Parker wants to stop at the drug store to pick up a prescription on his way home from work? He has driven around the block twice already and the nearest parking lot is a good three blocks away.

Sam figures it will only take a minute to run in and pick up his prescription, so he pulls up to the no parking zone on the corner in front of the store.

True, if he's fast enough, Sam might get back to his car before it is tagged, but he's still taking an awful chance. What if someone stopping for the arterial at that corner pulls out into the intersection and is hit by another car?

He might well contend that he couldn't see the oncoming traffic because his view was blocked by Sam's car and the chances are that Sam will be defending a suit in court. If the fact that Sam's car was parked illegally is found to have caused the accident, he will probably have to pay damages.

The same could happen if a pedestrian steps out into traffic and is struck because he couldn't see around Sam's car. In certain instances, at night for example, the owner might be sued when an illegally parked vehicle itself is struck, if it has been stopped in an entirely unexpected spot.

Remember, usually there is a good reason why an area has restricted or no parking. It is better to take your time and walk a few blocks than to risk the consequences of blocking a zone which for safety reasons should be kept clear.
