Farms Decrease But Sales Move To Record High

Cash sales by Oregon farmers hit a new record high in 1966, topping the 1965 level by some eight per cent.

The cost of farming also went up in 1966, according to the preliminary estimates quoted by Mrs. Elvera Horrell, extension agricultural economist at Oregon State University.

Livestock sales, notably cattle and calves, jumped 14 per cent over 1965 while crop sales were up some 3 per cent. Biggest contributors to the increase in the value of crops were strawberries and cherries.

Addition of some $24 million in government payments, about the same as last year, brought total cash received by the state's farmers to $538 million. While dollar figures for farm operating costs aren't out yet, Mrs. Horrell says indications are that feed and livestock will prove to have cost farmers more in 1966, but the total amount spent for hired labor and seed many show some decrease.

The trend toward fewer but larger farms continued during the year, says Mrs. Horrell. There were some 40,500 farms in Oregon at the start of 1967, according to U.S. Department of Agriculture estimates. This is 1,500 less than a year earlier and the smallest number of farms in the state since near the turn of the century. Acreage per farm is up sharply.

More farm sales and fewer farms add up to a boost in the income of individual farmers, points out Mrs. Horrell. The net income per farm in 1966 is estimated to be $3,865, 14 per cent above 1965 and the highest since records were started in 1949.

Oregon is still below the national average income per farm, which is $5,024. Lowest average farm income for the year was in West Virginia where the figure was $1,055. Arizona, at $21,071, was tops in this department.
