Health Tips From AMA

Small boats by the hundreds of thousands are back in the water this month, freshly scraped and painted after a winter of storage.

In the deep South many boating fans are on the water most of the winter, but in most of the nation June is the season to get back on the lakes and streams.

Boating accidents are becoming more prevalent each season, as more comparative amateurs acquire boats and take to the water. Pamphlets on boating safety are available in many sporting goods stores and at boat and motor dealers. If you have a boat, and even if you think you know how to handle it, play it safe; get a safety booklet and study it.

Common sense and good manners are cardinal safety principles in boating. Show respect for other boats, swimmers and fishermen. It doesn't take much knowledge of boating to know that a big lake on a windy day can be dangerous for small craft.

Know the capacity of your boat and don't overload it. Don't stand up or change seats in a small craft while it is under way. Make certain your boat contains life preservers for each passenger. Life jackets are an excellent idea for small children and non-swimmers.

Only an irresponsible skipper will buzz a dock, wharf or anchored craft. You may miss. Reduce speed through anchorages. Your wake can damage other property. Avoid boating too close to water skiers, fishermen and other boats. Don't jump or dive from a moving boat. You may have the breath knocked out of you, or hit floating debris.

Stay within easy range of the shore on large bodies of water. Sudden squalls can play havoc with the unwary boatsman. If your boat overturns, stay with it. The chances are that sooner or later someone will pick you up. Very few individuals are in good enough physical condition for a long swim in rough or cold water.

Republicans Say Ullman Off Base On Debt Increase

WASHINGTON — The Republican Congressional committee recently said that Rep. Al Ullman was "out of step with the Congress and the country" when he voted for a huge increase in the Federal debt ceiling.

The attempt to raise the debt limitation by $29 billion was defeated by a vote of 210 to 197, the committee noted. Representative Ullman was one of the Democrats voting for the increase requested by President Johnson.

"The House vote was an expression of public disenchantment with the incessant increases in Federal debt, spending and taxes," the committee said. "But apparently Representative Ullman hasn't gotten the message. His vote in favor of a massive increase Federal spending is out of step with the Congress and the country."

The committee noted that the $29 billion debt increase which the President requested came on top of a $6 billion boost approved less than three months ago by Congress. If it had been enacted, the GOP group said it would have meant a $72 billion increase in the public debt ceiling since 1961 when the Democrats came into office.

The committee called for cut-backs in Federal domestic spending while the Vietnam war continued and said it hoped Congressman Ullman would support these reductions.
