If you don't fertilize this FALL...

You might not fertilize at ALL!

One of the best reasons we can think of for fertilizing this fall is the weather we may have next spring. As you remember, last spring was a bad one. Snow, hail, rain, and cold in February, March, April and right into May. And the work piled up. Next spring may be as bad -- or worse.

Why take a chance that it might happen again next spring? You can take a big part of the work load off your shoulders by fertilizing this fall.

Foul spring weather and the early season rush are not the only good reasons for fertilizing in the fall. Fall fertilization works for you all winter long, decaying crop residues, giving crops a fast start in the spring. Fall fertilization reduces soil compaction and makes plant nutrients available in the soil when they are needed most by your crops.

For information about soils that are most suitable for fall fertilization, what crops do best with fall fertilization, and for details about how, when, and why -- consult the Soil Fertility Specialists at your United States Steel Farm Service Center. You'll get the finest in products, personalized attention, and information that will help you increase profits and yields.

So take advantage of the many things fall fertilization has to offer. Stop in at your nearest USS Farm Service Center -- next spring you'll be glad you did.
