NOTHING

Is it true?

"Quick recovery," as it pertains to hot water systems, is a term originally applied to gas-fired water heaters.

When it is used by fuels other than gas, perhaps you had better beware.

Advertising abounds in which quick recovery is claimed for "new, fast-action flameless water heaters."

Yet the increased use of electric energy in a water heater will not match the speed with which the intense blue flame of natural gas springs into action when hot water is drawn from a gas-fired heater. The extra gas needed to bring back your hot water supply full force is quickly used, then quickly shut off. There are no long waits (while your electric meter ticks merrily along) for the heating energy to generate full strength, and again when it returns to low.

This is why a 40-gallon gas-fired water heater will perform in your home ever better than a 66-gallon flameless water heater. This is why the amount of hot water you need will cost you less the natural gas way.
Lower first cost, lower daily operating cost.

The outstanding features of natural gas may be imitated, but they are not equalled. There is no other fuel exactly like it. Claim after claim after claim may be made, but natural gas continues to produce more hot water, faster, and for less.
