See that white space?

It represents 46.8% of the total size of this advertisement.

That same percentage—46.8%—is the amount of quick recovery you would sacrifice if you installed a 40-gallon electric water heater instead of a 40-gallon gas water heater.

To make plain talk even plainer, the white space above and to the left of this type you're reading graphically illustrates the fact that, size for size, gas water heaters provide a bonus of almost 50% in performance over electric.

Natural gas is a fuel that heats—then retreats—at a speed not possible with flameless heat.

That means energy costs are lower when water is heated the natural gas way. If a 40-gallon gas water heater will do the work better than a 66-gallon electric, then your first cost will also be considerably lower.

Why settle for less? Get this double saving—lower first cost, lower operating cost. Nothing heats water like natural gas.
