HOW MUCH NITROGEN FOR SUGAR BEETS?

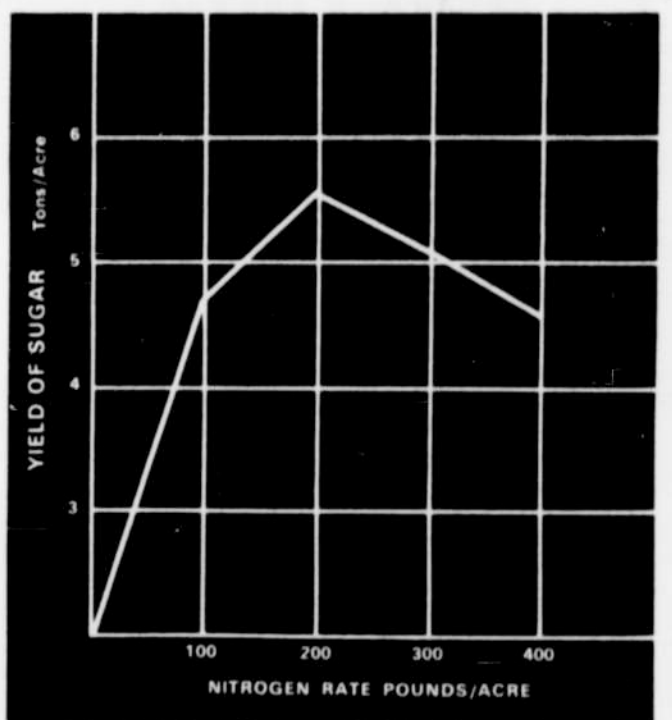

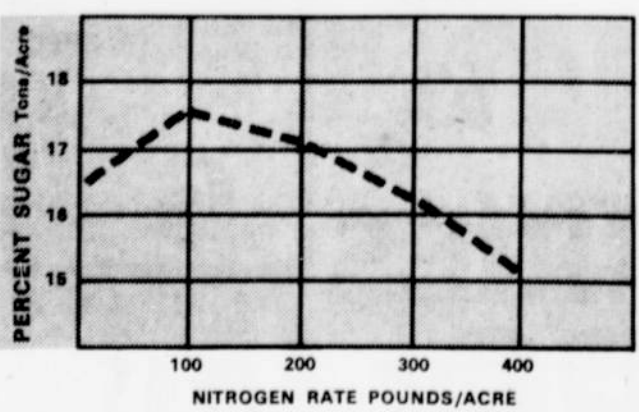

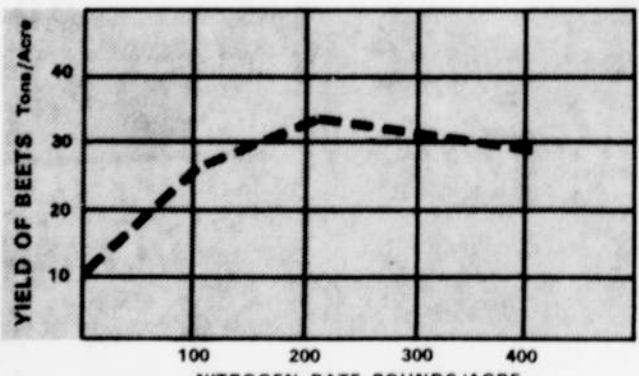

The rules of the game for raising sugar beets have changed. All because the payoff has changed. Until recently we were paid for tonnage of roots. Now we are paid for tonnage of sugar in the roots. And percentage of sugar in the roots can vary from 12% to 18% in this area.

Growers have found that next to soil moisture, nitrogen has more influence on tonnage and sugar content of beets than any other factor.

Beet growing tests using different amounts of nitrogen were recently made in this area on silt loam, typical of our soils here in the Columbia basin. The year-before crop was corn silage and no nitrogen had been applied on the corn. So there was practically no nitrogen carry-over. Now let's see what happens as we apply different amounts of nitrogen:

As we can see, percent of sugar in the roots was highest when 100 pounds of nitrogen was applied. But total root tonnage was highest when 200 pounds of nitrogen was applied. So what would pay off best—100 or 200 pounds of nitrogen per acre? The big chart gives the answer:

About 200 pounds of nitrogen per acre gave the best sugar yield. But notice that more nitrogen above the 200-pound level reduced sugar yield, while costing the grower more for fertilizer.

Don't over fertilize! So don't let anybody talk you into putting on "a little extra" nitrogen just to be sure the crop gets enough. This practice can cost you money two ways—reduce your beet checks; increase your fertilizer bills.

Watch Nitrogen Carry-over

And another thing: Keep in mind there was no carry-over nitrogen in the soil for these tests. If there had been, say, 50 pounds of carry-over nitrogen from fertilizing the crop the year before, then only 150 pounds of nitrogen should have been applied to the beets. But don't underfertilize.

Put it on at Right Time

Putting the nitrogen on at the right time is important too. It is best to have adequate nitrogen available for the crop during the early growing season for rapid growth of the tops. Then for the most sugar in the roots at harvest, the maturing crop should "run out" of N about 6 weeks before harvest. The tops should turn yellow in September.

Come in and let's talk over your sugar beet needs. Or give us a ring. We have more information that has paid off for good beet growers.
