It's Your Law!

CHANGING A WILL

"Since we've got a new car and just bought a house, I suppose we ought to look at our will to see if any changes need to be made," Fred said to his wife.

"Good idea. I'll get the will out of the file box and we can change what's necessary right now. This is a bad night for TV anyway," she replied.

"Wait a minute," Fred cautioned. "We can't change the will that way. We'll have to take it to our attorney to make any legal changes."

"What for? The will is signed and witnessed. We can make the changes in ink right on the will, initial the changes and that will be O.K., won't it?" Fred's wife asked.

"Not according to the law. We've got to make a codicil, the only legal way to change a will or write a new one. Let's not ask for more trouble than we've already got," Fred replied.

Fred is correct, of course. Only a codicil, a specific legal document, can legally alter a will. It must be drafted and signed in the same manner as the will. Two witnesses are required, just as with a will.

Corrections made to the original will, such as striking out a word or phrase, could make the entire will void. Even initialing the changes does not make them legal.

If the changes are complex, codicil may not be the best answer. An entirely new will might have to be drafted.

However, if the codicil is determined to be the best answer, then it should be attached to the will so that the heirs will know of the changes.

When your will was drafted, it took into account numerous factors that would relieve your family of financial and legal problems which could come if you had no will. Don't ruin all this planning by making illegal changes.

(Oregon lawyers offer this column as a public service. No person should apply or interpret any law without the aid of an attorney who is completely advised of the facts involved. Even a slight variance in fact may change the application of the law.)
