PHOTOGRAPHY TEACHES SENSITIVITY

The Cooperative Extension Service this year will introduce for the first time the 4-H Photography project designed to teach boys and girls skills in communication through pictures. Perhaps one of the most important communication skills a 4-H leader can teach any youngster today is how to use a camera. During the past generation recognition of its importance has crept out of the dark room over, the mound of baby pictures in the attic, over the television set, and into the available light of autumn 1968. Today in many instances the camera is a basic tool of life--like the car, the telephone, the typewriter. Where do you use it? Really, that's not the question. Where can't you use it?

The 4-H Leader is not a formal educator and thus not required to teach the three R's--that aged element considered basic in times past to education. But they can teach photography, and who can say that it is not as important. Picture making predates the three R's and their symbolic communication. Early man used a stick in the dirt instead of a camera. But the instinct to make a picture communicate was there. Photography will help 4-H members communicate with other people--the number one task of today. It will also help them fill the inner need to make treasured moments as permanent as possible.

A big question to new 4-H Photography leaders, of course, is: How do you teach photography to your 4-Hers if you know little about it yourself? The National 4-H Photography Development Committee in cooperation with Eastman Kodak has developed a complete course designed to help 4-H leaders guide the development of youngsters in a photography project from elementary picture taking through advanced photography--a stage where skills and interests might lead them to explore career opportunities. There are four main guide books for 4-H leaders and each has its county part in a member's manual. The manuals are entitled, "Exploring Photography". Using one book a year works out nicely. In the advanced stage of the 4-H Photography project there are skill guide sheets that cover such topics as color slides, news photography, enlarging, movies, photo recording, career opportunities in photography, investigation of small business opportunities, and photo visual presentations. All of the advanced pamphlets come with bibliographies so that the really skilled boy or girl can study the field in depth.

As the new 4-H Photography project member will soon discover, photography is not just matter of taking pictures. It's an art, a science, a communications tool. It teaches much more than just how to use a camera. It teaches how to look at people and nature and really "see". It is both self expression and the ability to see one's surroundings; not to mention the enjoyment of leisure time that will be realized by 4-H Photography members.

It definitely has a place in the learn by doing program.

FLB DECLARES '68 DIVIDEND

The Federal Land Bank Association of Ontario has declared a $20,965.35 dividend, which was mailed out Dec. 18 to its 650 member farmers and ranchers in the area, according to FLBA Manager Dan Roberts.

The figures represent the association's share of a $1,000,000 dividend declared by the Federal Land Bank of Spokane, which makes loans through the local association.

The FLBA of Ontario and the 60 other FLBA's in the four northwest states own all of the Spokane bank's capital stock. Nearly 26,000 association members are sharing in the dividend, which brings to more than $12,000,000 the total paid to members since 1944.
