Community Colleges Show Big Increase For Current School Year

Registrars of Oregon's 12 community colleges today reported enrollments totaling 42,169, somewhat higher than the 42,000-mark they had expected to reach at the close of the fourth week of the present term. Lloyd Thomas, State Director for the Oregon Board of Education, said the figures were the closest estimates available. They indicate 5,618 more students now are in classes than the 36,551 actual headcount attending at this time last year. He added that the registrars were finding the average student carries a heavier schedule this year than last. This was expected to produce a steep increase in the full-time equivalency represented in the total enrollment. Community college students, whether in vocational or academic courses, appear to be stepping up their study load more than 30 per cent.

Hood from 4,287 to 6,112; Portland from 11,027 to 13,954; Salem from 1,973 to 2,350; and Umpqua from 1,520 to 1,601.

At Lane Community College the count was 5,400 enrollees, but the figure was neither final nor truly comparative, it was pointed out. Excluded from it were all registrations for adult education classes and for Manpower Development and Training Act courses. About 2,600 more headcount is expected to be added, the registrars office reported. This would boost the Lane total well over the 7,018 estimated earlier, and would also strengthen the overall figure for the state. Last year at this time, Lane had 5,964 registered.

Do You Remember?

Last winter was a cold one in the Pacific Northwest—the roughest in 18 years. Heating systems in Washington and Oregon homes worked long hours—and at peak production for extended periods—to meet the challenge of below average temperatures. It is a well-known fact that people in gas-heated homes fared best during that unpleasant period. In a number of areas, flameless customers learned to their dismay that when all electric-heat customers required maximum heat at the same time, flameless energy was unable to deliver enough volume for adequate warmth. It may be a decade or more before we have another winter like that of 1968-69. Or it could happen again this year. Little lessons like this explain why more Americans heat with natural gas (over 33 million of them!) than all other forms of fuel combined. May we add you to that happy throng?
