ALL FOR SCIENCE

One way to learn how to catch more fish is to use the scientific approach.

This involves gathering and studying all available information over a period of times, and then drawing some conclusions from what you've learned.

What's called for, suggest the fishing experts at Mercury outboards, is building a complete file of data about the waters you fish the most. There are many sources for this material, and all of them should be used to make the system successful.

Newspaper reports are probably the easiest source of data. Most papers carry some fishing forecast columns taken from information gathered by conservation agencies. Also, those papers with regular outdoor sections are good sources of information. Clip the columns and place in a file system such as that discussed later in this column.

Another reliable source is the notes you should be making each time you go fishing. These can be jotted on file cards and should show the date, place fished, success, water conditions, weather conditions, etc.

Magazine articles about similar lakes, or about species of fish you seek, should also be clipped.

Reports on fish stocking, new lakes, pollution kills - almost anything that affects fish - can be used to help determine where the good fishing might be at any particular time.

After several years of clipping and saving material, some valuable information will be noticed by the alert angler who takes time to study all the data he has gathered.

The file system mentioned earlier is one the fishing gang at Mercury has known about for some time. Simply set up a folder or large envelope for each month of the year you intend to fish. Mark a red pencil mark at the top of material indicating hot fishing, a blue mark where fishing is poor. This way, it's easy to thumb through the file and soon know whether you should go fishing this weekend.

You probably should go anyway. After all, you're a scientist gathering information.
