It's Your Law!

MOVING EXPENSES
One out of every five American families moves each year, and a majority of those moves are made in the summer.

Those moving this summer should be aware that the new Tax Reform Act of 1969 will let them deduct more of their cost-of-moving than the previous law allowed. And they should keep accurate track of those costs so they will have the figures at tax-paying time early next year.

Three important new deductible moving expenses are these: Pre-move house-hunting trips; temporary living expenses at a new job location, and the expenses of selling buying or leasing a residence. There are limits on these deductions: The first two categories have a limit of $1,000 total, and the three categories have a limit of $2,500.

For the first time, moving expenses are deductible for qualified self-employed persons as well as to employees.

Another change in the law requires that, before moving expenses are deductible, the employee's principal job site be 50 miles -- measured by the shortest usual route -- farther from his residence than his former job. Previously the new location had to be at least 20 miles farther from his residence than from his former place of employment.

One reason for Congress' liberalizing the moving-expense deduction, experts say, is its recognition of modern needs and living habits -- to encourage the mobility of labor as an important part of a dynamic, full-employment economy.

1971 Chevrolet Light-Duty Trucks

Front disc brakes as standard equipment on all but Chevy Vans highlight the many improvements in the 1971 Chevrolet light truck line. The disc brake system has a proportioning device for more balanced braking between front and rear wheels. Also new are a more massive looking grille, improved cab seating and ventilation, and more powerful headlamps. All engines will operate on the new lower lead fuels and meet required Federal emission standards.
