VANDALS TAKE HIGH RISK

Using insulators on high-voltage transmission lines as clay pigeons can make a dead duck out of a sharpshooting vandal, according to Harold Cantrell, Bonneville Power Administration Walla Walla Area manager.
Many cases of accidental death have occurred as a result of intentional and malicious damage to electrical system equipment. A bullet smashing into an insulator may cut loose a power line and bring death to the person who fired the gun. A broken high-voltage power line does not even have to make a direct hit on a human being to cause death by electrocution.
The tragedies resulting from vandalism are isolated cases, but costs from damage to power lines continue to mount. Bonneville Power Administration reported that for the 12 months ending June 30, 1971, damages to the BPA system amounted to $85,264. This means an average of $7,105 per month, and most of the damage is attributed to shooting of insulators.
Power outages caused by a destructive individual can cause thousands to suffer. Besides, the inconvenience to residents of the area affected, a power outage can bring on disastrous consequences to persons under intensive medical care, the elderly, the handicapped, and the very young. Emergency services such as medicine, law enforcement, communications and transportation are curtailed or stopped altogether. Food spoils, industry lags, and farmers and businessmen suffer financial loss.
Persons observing acts of vandalism are encouraged to report them to the nearest BPA office.
