For the first time since the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor and started their drive to the south the tide of battle seemed to have turned slightly in favor of the United Nations a few days ago.

Dozens of Japan's ships have been sunk or damaged and hundreds of planes have been downed by American and Dutch aviators and sailors.

The United Nations are still on the defensive and face many reverses before they can take the offensive, which they must do to win the war.

Of course, all Americans believe that we will win in due course of time. Such optimism is a stimulent to American morale, but over-confidence is detrimental to the allied cause.
