Sage Grouse Can Be Seen On Strutting Grounds

A unique wildlife demonstration is in progress in many places in eastern Oregon this month and outdoorsmen may witness the outstanding event if they wish to do so.

It's the sage grouse booming and strutting season which peaks generally in early April. The big grouse gather first on the lower flats and then at higher elevations as the weather warms. Grouse gather on the same strutting grounds year after year. Located generally on broad, grassy flats, some strutting grounds may cover a mile or more of area.

The activity is a ceremonial mating ritual which begins shortly before daylight and terminates after sun-up. Sage grouse from several miles in all directions come winging in each morning for the brief interlude until the mating season is over. Game biologists visit the booming grounds each spring to make a census of the birds to determine grouse numbers going into the nesting season.

Male grouse establish territories and then attempt to attract females into their protective sphere by puffing out their chests, opening and closing their tail feathers, and emitting booming calls made by throat pouches.

Rival males fight viciously for mastery over a given area. Those which put up the strongest showing in strutting and fighting become flock masters whose privilege it is to perpetuate the species. Following the month-long breeding season, the birds disperse to set up housekeeping. Young sage grouse hatch any time from mid-May through June.

Some of the largest strutting grounds are located on Antelope Flat, Sagehen Flat,
