Graphoanalysis

Ellen Jones

It isn't necessary to take anyone's word for the validity of personality assessment through handwriting strokes. You can try it on your own writing.

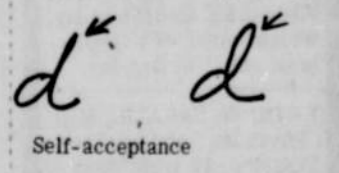

One of the problems which gives all of us a certain amount of trouble is our sensitiveness to criticism. We all need to be conscious of our impact on others, but when we let our imagination take over and let the fear of being rejected or of not being accepted, our writing will give our secret away.

We are not born sensitive, but acquire this fear through repeated hurts, through thoughtless criticism, slights imagined or real. We want and need the approval of parents, friends, business or marital partners.

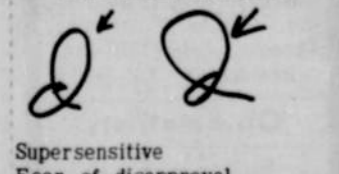

Being supersensitive may make us fearful to try something new, afraid to form new friendships. It may make us draw into our shell or become resentful. At any rate, we cannot do our best or appear our best under these circumstances.

Check something you have written and see what conclusion you can draw from eight or ten letter "d". The following illustration will give you an idea of what to look for. If greatly inflated "d" loops are found, ask yourself if this feeling of fear is really necessary, or is your imagination making things seem worse than they are.

Retraced Slight Loop

Self-acceptance

Supersensitive Fear of disapproval. The larger the loop, the greater the fear.

"The real cost of welfare is not in cash," says Pennsylvania State Senator Richard A. Snyder. "The irreparable cost is in fractured families, reduced production in the economy, and eroded moral values."
