How often do you stop to think about an impressive statistic that is written about glibly? For example, 5 million unemployed. Bet that conjures up an image of desperate breadwinners who were thrown out of their jobs and are hopelessly walking the streets in search of non-existent work.

But such is not the case, according to George Hagedorn, chief economist of the National Association of Manufacturers. It's not that the Department of Labor's statistics are assembled for false impressions, but rather that you would have to wade through masses of figures every month to get the true picture. Also public media are likely to give only the amount of detail they think you and I will read.

Actually, in 1971 the statistics-collectors listed only 1,810,000 unemployed people who were "household heads." That's just 36 percent of the 4,993,000 unemployed. The rest, or 64 percent, were young people without family responsibilities, wives who worked occasionally, and other similar groups.

Less than half the unemployed had "lost" a previous job. The rest were looking for a job for the first time or had left their job voluntarily. Most of them had been jobless for less than three months. In fact, 45 percent had been out of work less than five weeks.

Will finding jobs be hopeless at this time? Not at all. While unemployment remained steady in the second half of 1971, the number of employed persons rose by 1.5 million. Therefore, new jobs are being created at a substantial pace.

That doesn't mean that there are not some people whose inability to find a job over a long period has placed them in a desperate situation. But there are a lot less than 5 million of them, says Hagedorn.

Nature Weaves A Wondrous Fiber

In this era of highly justified environmental concern, more and more people are joining hands with nature in protective alliance.

And, as often happens when friendships are formed, we are beginning to better appreciate the attributes of our new and natural partner in life.

Take, for instance, her ability to weave and gift us with wondrous fibers like wool. In addition to being naturally wrinkle-resistant, colorfast, resilient, water-repellent and fire-resistant, wool is also completely biodegradable. And that's because wool is a protein fiber, made of the same substance as your own hair and fingernails.

Further, because woolen fabrics breathe with your body, they help to conserve your body temperature in hot or cold weather. This, in turn, helps to conserve precious fuels used in heating and air conditioning.

All of which goes to prove that it's not only nice—but also wise—to join hands with Mother Nature.

Chances Good To Find Meteorites In NW

The Pacific Northwest has been little explored for discovery of possible meteorites, according to Harry G. Johnson, meteorite consultant for the Oregon Museum of Science and Industry in Portland, and the area should have bright prospects of a good scientific future in that field. When meteorites are found, he said, most discoveries are made by persons engaged in casual, ordinary activities across the land such as hiking, camping or vacationing. People who work with the land directly such as farmers and members of construction crews have an especially good opportunity to make discoveries of meteorites. These objects which reach the earth from across an unthinkable abyss of time and distance are now especially needed by scientists in relation to the space program.

While the origin of meteorites is still uncertain, many scientists believe the objects are part of the solar system, out of the asteroid belt located between Mars and Jupiter. Meteorites may fall to the earth when they are captured by the gravity of the planet, or perhaps sometimes their own collisions with each other may send them ricocheting wildly. A few might come from immense stellar distances beyond the solar system.

The experience of scientists indicates that while meteorites may be called rare, they also are scattered over the surface of the earth plentifully enough so that a serious searcher can be said to have a fair chance of finding a specimen sooner or later. A rudimentary fund of information concerning meteorites may be gleaned from reference books in public libraries, and a generous collection of the actual objects found around the world may be seen at the Oregon Museum of Science and Industry in Portland.

Meteorites vary in size from microscopic bits to large masses several feet or more in diameter. Most meteorites found by the average person measure from two inches to twenty-four inches across. In most cases they are very irregular in shape.
