The 1971 Oregon Legislature set records in environmental protection by moving rapidly to meet many immediate crises. In one five-month session, laws were passed for (1) siting and regulation of nuclear power plants, (2) disposal of hazardous wastes, (3) recreational trails system, (4) funding for bicycle paths, (5) coastal planning, (6) regulation of timber cutting practices, (7) deposits on bottles and cans, (8) improved enforcement powers for the Department of Environmental Quality, (9) limitation on field burning, and (10) automobile emission control.

These laws were passed because each dealt with a specific concern which could be demonstrated in dramatic fashion. The Capitol hearing rooms were full of old beer cans when the bottle and can bill was being considered. 250 Bicyclists pedaled from Portland to Salem to show the TV cameras about the bicycle path bill.

The unfinished business for the 1973 legislature is to construct machinery and procedures for long-run solutions to environmental protection. Here are some of the approaches that will probably be considered: (1) Better understanding of the environmental impact of governmental action (an Oregon Environmental Policy Act requiring reports which would tell, for example, how much agricultural bottom land would be taken away by a proposed highway near a river); (2) Better planning of our environment (such as planning the location of any major new industrial plants in the Willamette Valley); (3) Better techniques of preventing environmental damage

(maybe allowing any citizen to sue in court to prevent, for example, fish damage due to a dam); (4) Better funding of environmental needs (should we use highway funds to develop a mass transit system from Portland to Eugene?); (5) Better ways of protecting people dislocated by environmental change (can we have government money available for retraining and relocating people who lose their jobs when, for example, environmental regulation causes the shutting down of a factory that is polluting a river?); Each of these approaches will have major opposition. None have the potential of bringing a thousand advocates to a legislative hearing. Yet these long-range solutions will have the greatest impact on Oregon's environmental future.
