SIDA Board Expanded To 18

Eight new directors have been elected by the Southwestern Idaho Development Association (SIDA) in a board expansion aimed at representation for the "younger generation concerned with sound, orderly land and water development." Edward E. Parsons, Sr., Payette farmer-rancher and SIDA president, said Wednesday all of the additional directors are relatively young farmers, ranchers or businessmen. Their election boosts board membership to 18 directors. "We have expanded the board to give the younger generation concerned with sound, orderly land and water development in the area a voice in our organization's constructive programs," Parsons said. He described the new directors as SIDA's "young board."
